For example, chronic pain conditions have long been known to interfere with mobility, often resulting in movement impairment, such as decreased walking speed, increased muscular tension, and spasms, particularly as a side effect of pharmacologic pain management. Fortunately, recent advances in pharmacologic pain management have broadened the range of effective analgesics, such as opioids, nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs), and tricyclic antidepressants (TCAs). Non-pharmacologic treatment of chronic pain conditions has also advanced, with particular advances in orthopedic, sport, and rehabilitative medicine. For example, physical medicine and rehabilitative medicine are now recognized as viable complementary components of care for pain management. Integrative or multimodal treatment approaches have long been recognized as effective in that they take into account the entire patient, including physical, emotional, and mental dimensions of the person. When matched with appropriate tools, technology, and appropriate resources, the therapy can lead to improved function, reduced side effects, and improved quality of life. Despite these advances, treatment options and systems for providing consistent care for patients with chronic pain conditions are still lacking in various respects. While pharmacologic pain management is capable of providing sufficient relief for some chronic pain conditions, some patients suffer from unsatisfactory pain management due to the side effects of drug treatment or the patient's lack of compliance with the prescribed medication. In addition, while physical medicine and rehabilitative medicine are more effective in certain patients, many patients do not receive treatment with this modality. Another limitation of certain types of treatment modalities is that they are often focused on a particular type of patient or condition, for example, prosthetic devices that may only be useful for a certain type of amputee. Accordingly, there remains a need for improved treatments and systems for addressing chronic pain conditions that may be more effective in meeting the needs of a particular patient or group of patients than existing treatments.We are studying the structure and function of mammalian telomeric
